Dear Idaem,

I didn't see the interview in the Times until yesterday and then I took it home to Margaret my friend. I am going to frame it and I may print it at the top of my note paper or maybe wear it on a badge across my chest. I am not sure that it was true but I would like it more the less if it were untrue because then it would be more of a compliment and a surer test of your friendship. Probably most of the time what you took for conscience was self consciousness or laziness or cowardice; but I don't care so long as I fooled you into issuing a diploma that I can use any time I am arrested for vagrancy.

Said I saw you quite often, my dear. Re breaking up of our brief little adventure with the American Magazine is one of the saddest recollections of my life and the worst part of it, forme was the loss of your companionship, with all the encouragement and sympathy and tolerance of mistakes and generous appreciation of achievement that went with it. Perhaps It was too good to last in this imperfect world; yet I am not without hope that it may be renewed one of these days. Who knows?

Ever Yours
