Boston Law School

Insert Pound's characterization of the early training of the American Lawyer - as an Apprentice Training. No cultural background to try it. It was here that Boston University made its break in '71. (Insert Memo.)

"Thus we began in this country with a purely apprentice training. Everything made for the system of reading in the office of a local practitioner which obtained in the United States until within a generation, and still obtains to some extent in some localities. But another force was active to promote the academic professional training which has become characteristically American. We could not receive English law exactly as it stood in the English books. We had to make provision for many things which English judges and English law-makers had never been called upon to consider. Much in English law had been devised for social and political and economic conditions very different from ours. For the first half of the economic conditions very different from ours. For the first half of the nineteenth century, at least, the energies of courts and lawyers were devoted to a task of working out an American common law, of developing a system of certain and detailed legal precepts adequate to the requirements of American life. Apprentice-trained lawyers could not rise to the exigencies of this demand. Accordingly, along side of the apprentice type of legal education there grew up what may be called the academic professional type."

Teacher of Law

Young's remarks

"Some thirty years ago, I was teaching law in the Law School of Boston University. For the last fifteen years, I have not been engaged in the teaching or practice of the law but rather in business. During that period I have had an opportunity to sit on the side-lines and watch the lawyers and the law schools function. When I was teaching the subject of common law pleading, I began our course with a quotation from Pollack and Maitland which, as nearly as I can now remember, ran something like this -

> "The law will yield up its reason to no man who lacks the patience to study its history."

"That quotation I still subscribe to, but as a result of my latest experience, I would now add this -

> "The law will yield up its satisfactions to no man who lacks the vision and understanding to project its future."

"Fortunately, one law school in America, and I think it no disparagement to the others to say the greatest law school in the world, adopted a method of teaching and injected into its courses a spirit of training which led its students, not only to look backward over the history of the law for the purpose of discovering its reason, but to look forward as well to a discovery of what the law might be. In a word, it endeavored to train its men to project the curve of past development forward through the conflicting political, social, and economic forces into the future. That is most important.

"Our business is now largely run by great institutions which are designed to go on forever. The managers of those great concerns are compelled to formulate policies which take more account of the future than the present. They wish from their lawyers advice, not only upon what the law is, but more important, on what it is to be."

From manuscript - Owen D. Young

Quotation from Mr. Eames

Interesting analysis of Young as a lawyer are to be had from his associates still in the Tyler office. There is the present senior partner of the firm, Burton E. Eames, who came into the office in 1905 about the time that Mr. Tyler asked Mr. Young to take over affairs for a year.

"Owen Young," says Mr. Eames, "would get at the root of a complicated case more quickly and more accurately than any other man I have ever known. He was resourceful in argument, leaning always toward compromise; did not get angry. He held that lawyers owed the duty of adjustment to clients. He is a man of absolute integrity, high principles, resourceful, unusual power of analysis and a breadth of view.

"He had great firmness, too, was absolutely unyielding when he had come to a decision. I remember we were negotiating once with parties in regard to a building where there were numbers of points of controversy which were being settled one by one. ~~deeds to clear up.~~ Things seemed to be very well straightened out. I even went down with Young to look over the property. But one of the men on the other side backed down on one of the issues. 'All right,' "Mr. Young said," 'if you are not going to stand by our agreement we'll go back and begin all over.' He said it quietly - no fireworks but you knew he meant it."
