Dear Miss Tarbell:

Without desiring to prolong the discussion about Mr. Kettering's article, I do want to mention your one sentence in which you say "it (unemployment) ought not to be a difficult matter to handle if employers sensed its full meaning and were willing to give it as intelligent consideration as they do mechanical waste and replacement."

The trouble is that while employment is being made in one industry unemployment is being created in another.

One business is expanding and taking on people to work and there is another type of business which is hard put to get money to meet its bills and it finally curls up and dies.

Yours very truly,

A. W. Robertson
