When I visited W in the fall of 94, he was in Cleveland with his footprint on the last of the annual school events. He was still in his white shirt and tie, a bit of the pride of the valley.

I was pleased to see him and his wife, who had been married over 50 years, at the valley.

I talked to him about his career and his family, and we laughed about the past and the present.

He was a man of great character, and I knew that he would continue to be a source of inspiration and motivation for all who knew him.
The county court demanded that the mill be divided. The air was very still, a great deal of dust was raised. The mill was set on fire. The miller, Mr. Baker, was arrested.

The conflict between these two families led to the emergence of new legislation to regulate the waterpower of rivers. The new legislation was supported by many, but met with resistance in certain areas.

The county was divided into two districts, each with its own council. The current president of the county was a Republican who had been re-elected.

The current mayor was a man named Smith, who had no political alliances with either party. However, he was very influential and often had to mediate between the two factions. It was a divided and tense time.
