Syndicalism — the belief that only a small group of people can run an economy and that all other people should be controlled by that group. Syndicalists believe that the state should be abolished and that the workers should form their own government.

Businessmen — under pressure from syndicalists, many businessmen have sought to accommodate the syndicalists' demands. They have made some concessions, but the workers are not satisfied.

Communism — under pressure from syndicalists, many businessmen have sought to accommodate the syndicalists' demands. They have made some concessions, but the workers are not satisfied.

 Parliamentary system — the elected representatives of the people form the government.

In conclusion, the conflict between syndicalists and businessmen is likely to continue. The workers are not satisfied with the concessions made by the businessmen, and the syndicalists are determined to achieve their goals.

People are more divided than ever before. In the end, the only way to resolve this issue is to have a referendum among the people. The result will be decided by the people.
