Dear Miss Chandler:

The last three months have seen my small world in considerable confusion, so much confusion that I have given scant consideration to letters. Among the neglects, a serious one I count it, has been my failure to write you thanking you for the documents you have sent me - Mr. Young's speech at Queen's University. Such interesting observations and thinking and so sound.

And this talk to the Test Boys in September. It must have stirred the youngsters and how fine it is to have given the time and thought that he did to giving them something that really counted at this moment.

I want so much to have a talk with you one of these days. Are you to be around next week - say Monday - and could you come in to tea with me at the National Arts Club about five o'clock? I want to see for myself how you are, hear how all the family is making it. If Monday will not do we will try another day.

Cordially yours
