Dear Madam:

Referring to your interest in Abraham Lincoln, we ask your attention to one of our recent publications, Cole, "Stage-coach and Tavern Tales of the Old Northwest".

The log house and other primitive dwellings furnish a wealth of historic lore in which the name of Lincoln has, to some extent, been associated--as he travelled about from place to place both prior and subsequent to his nomination and election. There are illustrations of taverns where Lincoln tarried, and some interesting data in connection with the taverns and Mr. Lincoln's presence, which may be of interest for your Lincoln collection.

We enclose descriptive circular and will appreciate the favor of your order if of interest.

Respectfully yours,

THE ARTHUR H. CLARK COMPANY

THE OLD NORTHWEST WAS SETTLED in the days before railroads, when every pioneer provided his own transportation and every cabin offered hospitality. Soon stagecoaches began to ply over the first primitive roads and certain frontiersmen adopted the profession of innkeepers — others of bandits. In these early taverns and along these first roads occurred many amusing and tragic incidents, rich with the flavor of pioneer life and racy with the humor of the quaint personalities of the time.

Mr. Cole, late president of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin and editor of the Baraboo (Wisconsin) News, spent many years in the collection of the material embodied in this book. He traveled in person over much of the territory, searching out the remains of the old taverns, interviewing the taverners and taking
