

January 7, 1932

Dear Mr. Reynolds:

I was shocked when I came into town just after the New Year to find on my desk your letter, with the enclosures, so long neglected. Please pardon me. I went away about the time that you wrote and nothing but imperative mail was sent me.

I think I have now about all that I shall need for my story and as I promised you I shall try to handle it with discretion. However, having talked with Mr. Young and Mr. Gordon Abbott and read certain notes of Stuart Crocker I do not have the same feeling of uneasiness about the "Dallas Situation" as I did when in Boston. They talked quite freely about it. I shall not do that, of course, but you can rely upon me not to put anything in beyond what we agreed upon, except it comes from Mr. Young or Mr. Abbott and that I shall use entirely innocuously.

I have not seen Mr. Young for some weeks. I know he must be tired though he never would admit it. Mrs. Young is about the same. I am hoping to see her in a few days if she is well enough.

Thank you for your good wishes. I am well - not my exertions that are tiring me but the anxiety less they prove very unsatisfactory.

I do appreciate your kindness in all this matter. I am afraid that I turned up at a difficult moment for you all. I shall be interested to know what re-organization follows Mr. Tyler's death.

With all good wishes, believe me

Very sincerely yours

Mr. T. M. Reynolds
Tyler, James, Wright & Hooper
Ames Building
Boston, Mass.