At Lunch at Judge Gary's on July 14, in talking about the work of the Corporation, Judge Buffington said, "Here, I think, is one of the most extraordinary things I ever heard, and in a business corporation employing 300,000 men, their markets the world, their industries scattered in every direction and of every sort, yet so organized and with such a spirit of organization they consider it their business to look after all who in any way touch or have touched the carrying out of their enterprise. That quiet and great man over there," pointing to Cisse, "said to me, 'Judge, you are going to Italy. I want you to do an errand for me. There is an old woman over there that we have been sending money to for some time, and we have been afraid she was not getting it. She may not be, and we want you to see just what the circumstances are, and that no agent or relative is taking it away from her.'

"Now, what are you going to think of a Corporation that does business in that fashion?"

And somebody commented on what are you going to think of a member of the Federal bench who will go on errands like that for a friend when he is on his wedding trip as Judge Buffington is.
