My dear Mr. Hardy:

My secretary wrote you that I have been away from my desk for some little time. On returning I find your letter undated. That training master of yours ought to have impressed upon you the necessity of exact dates and exact addresses. Maybe he did and you forgot.

At all events I am grateful for the letter. It follows lines which in one form or another according to circumstances are in actual practice in a number of industries. In the large industries of course it is impossible for the higher-ups to give the personal attention which you received. Yours was an excellent opportunity for intensive training I should say. I want to keep your letter among my notes and I suppose if the time comes when I want to use it practically as you have written it there would be no objections.

Thanking you again for your kindness in sending me an account of this experience, believe me

Very truly yours
