Carl Schurz gives a lively picture of the influx of would-be officers, particularly of foreigners, many of whom naturally sought Schurz' influence. They came with impressive letters of introduction, with claims - sometimes genuine, sometimes not - of military training and experience, and they came depending upon recommendations which, while they might count in the old world they were not slow in learning were not worth the paper on which they were written in the new. One such that Schurz tells of was a general who was depending upon a row of ancestors several hundred years long. Finally he had an audience with the President and immediately he presented his family tree. Mr. Lincoln listened to him gravely. "That need not trouble you," he said, "they will not be in your way if you behave yourself as a soldier." "The poor young count looked puzzled," says Mr. Schurz, "and when the audience was over he asked me what the President could have meant by so strange a remark."
