Dear Clara: [Walker]

How are you? It must be beautiful from your window these days. I have just come from Connecticut and the country has turned from gold to red - beautiful there.

When I came back I found the enclosed letter from Judge Clarke on my desk. I had been interested to know whether or no it was he who wrote an editorial in the Vindicator a number of years ago and which your father showed me. I think you know it. I wanted to be sure, too, that in Judge Clarke's view my story was all right. I told him that you had seen it. Here is his letter and he asks to be remembered to you. I am sure you will be pleased by what he says.

Send me the letter back when you get around to it. I would write you a longer letter but I am in a great hustle this morning having just come back to my desk.

Love to you
