My dear Jane Addams:

Andre' Maurois is coming to this country in June to look over the effects of the depression on our workers. He wants to see something of what happened in Chicago. I don't quite know what. Rutger Jewett, his editor, has asked me where it would be best for him to seek help in your town and I told him by all means to go to Hull House if it could be arranged. And that is the reason of this note with which I am troubling you.

Would it be possible to take Maurois in for the time that he has for Chicago, which I am afraid is not very long, at least I so judge from his letter to Mr. Jewett, take him in and let him have the benefit of the experience of your group through these difficult years, let them take him where they think he should go to see the real thing?

I wish I could see you - I think of you often with such deep affection and admiration, but it seems as if the ways of the world with me shut me off more and more from old friends. I miss the stimulus that you always brought me when I had the good fortune ~~to~~ occasionally meet you, but my admiration has deepened with years. You have been a very real influence in my life, dear Jane Addams.

Affectionately yours
