Dear Miss Tarbell,

Why you should be the least interested in indulging any more of the time out of your busy life on my feeble efforts is a question I am not even attempting to answer.

Your invitation, relayed to me by Mrs. McCormick, to have a copy of my biographical sketch forwarded fills me with violently conflicting emotions. Naturally I feel all set up and complimented but the knowledge of the crudity of my effort and the disillusionment that is bound to come to you as you read it, humbles me quite completely.

There might come a time, however, when I shall be able to do a job of this sort effectively and if that time ever does arrive I am quite sure I shall not have forgotten the subject of my first attempt nor the charming personage who caused me to undertake it.

Frank Sparks.
