

Mich. 5. p. 4. (Editorial Tribune)
1st ¶ of "The Inaugural Address." The Inaugural Address of the new President does not require ne the usual synopsis of such documents made for the benefit of indolent readers; for apart from the interest with which it is universally looked for, its brevity will bring it within the compass the efforts of the most reluctant readers of Messages, while its plainness & directness of speech will make its meaning clear to the lowest capacity. It is marked by no useless words & no feeble expression; "he who runs may read" it, and to twenty millions of people it will carry the tidings, glad or not,
