My dear Mr. Dublin:

I have just come into town after ten days absence and find on my desk your letter of May 8th, giving me the information in regard to the sex distribution of the six hundred and forty-one deaths from alcohol, reported by your organization for the year 1929. Thank you for your prompt attention to my wishes. Of course I understand that the Company draws no conclusion one way or the other, with reference to the value of the prohibition amendment. As I understand it you furnish statistics to the public and leave it to the intelligence and integrity of the commentators to draw their inferences.

Thanking you for your prompt attention to my request, believe me

Very sincerely yours

Mr. Louis I. Dublin
