July 11, 1902.

My dear Miss Tarbell:

Your letter of June 6 was duly received; but unfortunately iy gave no address on this side the Atlantic, and I have been constantly hoping to hear from you since. As it is, I see no way save writing to you care of McClure's Magazine, and asking your people there to forward the letter to you.

I regret this all the more, for the reason that it seems now pretty well settled that we shall establish the family at Wyk on the island of Föhr, and that about the fifth of August my wife and I will go for two weeks to the Scandinavian countries.

This being the case, I hope that you can come into the north of Germany before the above date, namely, August 5. In all probability, from the first to the fifth I shall be either in Berlin or Wyk, and would be exceedingly glad to meet you in either place.

Last, but not least, let me thank you heartily for the magazines containing my article on Tolstoi, which duly appeared.

Hoping that this letter may reach you in time, I remain, with all kind wishes,

Very respectfully yours,

Andrew D. White
