Dear Miss Giles:

I have not thanked you for your kind letter in returning the chapters of my Recollections.

You are right, of course, in saying that the stuff is too remote for The Cosmopolitan. I felt that all along. I doubt whether it is worth your while to take the trouble to read the remaining twenty five thousand words which I hope one of these days to have done.

I did not see the start in The Cosmopolitan at all, but as Mr. Burton had kindly suggested after reading the first chapter that he would like to see the rest of it I sent it on. Don't you really think we better consider the matter closed? To be honest, it is not just your kind of material. Is not that so?

Very sincerely

Miss Dorothy Giles
