MARY BARNETT GILSON

What's Past Is Prologue

HERE is a vivid record of the business life of a remarkable woman who, leaving the ivy-covered walls of Wellesley at the turn of the century, abandoned her cultural pursuits for a job in the Pittsburgh steel district and began a long and significant career in industry.

Her story opens at a time when few women occupied positions in business and runs through thirty years of industrial development in America. In terms of their human significance, it relates her experiences as a personnel executive in the factory, as a government worker in munitions plants during the last war, as a counsellor and research worker in the sugar and textile industries, and as a student of British unemployment insurance in England and Geneva. Behind the bare narration is always a sympathetic interpretation of the meaning of on-going industrial events seen through the eyes of a person who has not been taken in by business success, but is primarily concerned with the rights and welfare of human beings.

Here you will find intimate portraits of leaders in the crusade for better industrial relations from Frederick W. Taylor on, as well as vivid, human accounts of the lives of workers in and out of the factory.

In 1931 upon the conclusion of her study of British unemployment insurance, Miss Gilson was called to her present post at the University of Chicago. There she is an Assistant Professor of Economics in a department that aims to integrate the social sciences.

Do you remember the time you gave me a letter of introduction
to Dorothy Confield Fisher?
Well, I sent her this folder & asked her if she would have time
to read my book &
she said she would
So I sent her a copy.
I await her verdict
eagerly (and anxiously)!

If I could quote
both you & her it
would be too wonderful.
But, as I've said, only
what you really think (as tho' I had to say that to you!). M.C.
