

Her field of work was extended rapidly by the pressure she herself threw upon the barriers which that large part of the community which had accepted the new scheme by force or at best half-heartedly insisted on keeping. Olive Schreiner in her book "Woman and Labor" declares the present demand of the woman of her world to be: "Give us labor and the training which fits for labor. We demand this, not for ourselves alone, but for the race! This was the demand of the American Woman 100 years ago, and it has been fully and freely met in the United States."
