Detroit, Mich.

Dear Mr. Fitzsimmons:

I returned to New York yesterday afternoon from an absence of some days. And just after I reached my apartment the postman came - his third trip, I believe, with your registered letter and a copy "of the smallest book in the world."

How can I thank you for your kindness for your sending me this exquisite item? You may be sure it will find an honored place in my collection and be passed on in time to 'old Allegheny', together with the description - your letter and my own notes on the way that the little book came to me. I have placed it in a small jewel case until such times as I find the <sup>a</sup> most satisfactory way of displaying it.

The inscribed copy of "He knew Lincoln" goes to you today. I should have sent it immediately upon my return to New York from Detroit but did not remain long enough to take care of all my correspondence. I shall not forget to remember you to Harry McClure if I should run across him. I do not often see him these days.

Please remember me most kindly to Mrs. Fitzsimmons - it was a pleasure to meet you both and I hope I shall have the opportunity one of these days to see you again.

With renewed thanks for your kindness, believe me my dear Mr. Fitzsimmons

Very sincerely yours
