

"All this city life," he says, "even business, shrinks to smaller proportions when I get back to the farm for a while. I suppose it might be counted an example of dual personality, but I do not see it that way. I have never been pried loose from the land nor shaken myself from the pull that drives a man back to his home acres. I still keep the place. I always shall; and when I get up there and get into overalls and wrestle with the same task I used to have to do as a boy, I'm about as happy as I know how to be. The quiet and the bodily toil of the farmer are the best restoratives I know for perspectives."
